

Doctors, Employment, and Social Security Benefits Eligibility

Q: Is it possible to receive partial Social Security benefits for a partial disability?

A: There aren't many short, simple answers when it comes to Social Security benefits. But this question has one; and that answer is "no." Though some other federal and state programs offer benefits to the partially disabled, social security benefits do not. According to the SSA, an applicant either has a qualifying disability, or he or she does not. With Social Security benefits, you are either disabled or you are not disabled, and therefore either approved or denied.

Q: My doctors say that there is no treatment that can help me, so why do I have to keep going to doctors?

A: Even in the case that a medical professional cannot improve your condition, seeing a doctor regularly is very important for getting social security benefits. Why is this? Because one of the most important parts of proving that you have a disability (and should receive Social Security benefits) is documentation. As evidence of a disability, the SSA will look at your medical records. If you don't see a doctor (and therefore have no real documentation of your disability) it is very possible that you will be rejected for social security benefits.

When applying for Social Security benefits, the SSA considers it your own responsibility to document and track the progress of your disability. If you wish to apply for Social Security benefits, it is key to be specific and forthright about your symptoms when you speak with your doctor; even if the visits do nothing for your condition. During each visit, assure that your doctor documents your symptoms and your condition. The more supporting evidence found in your medical records, the greater your chance of being approved for Social Security benefits.

Q: My disability allows me to work, but I cannot earn the same amount of money I did before. Can I still file for Social Security benefits?

A: Yes, you can still file for Social Security benefits. But your claim may not necessarily be approved. When the SSA decides whether or not you are eligible for social security benefits, one of the first things they look at is if you can do the same work you used to. If you cannot, they will look at your ability to have a substantial gainful employment in another field. In essence, whether or not you will qualify for Social Security benefits will depend on what kind of work you would be able to do, and how much you might earn. Related information Veterans lawyers Social security disability

About the Author

More information regarding social security attorney, browse by this web page I found.

Source: <http://read4me.net>